Dating to circa 1750, historic Long Acres Farm, historically known as the "Whitney-Adams-Twitchell House" is one of Sherborn's most distinctive antique residences, beautifully reimagined through the extensive interior and exterior renovations plus an expansion undertaken recently. The home has evolved over nearly three centuries, blending its early New England character with a fresh, casual California-inspired aesthetic designed for modern living. The current owners undertook a comprehensive renovation, thoughtfully updating virtually every room while preserving the architectural details and sense of history that make the property so special. At the heart of the home is a dramatically expanded and completely redesigned kitchen, creating a warm and sophisticated gathering space with generous proportions and an effortless connection to the surrounding living areas. Upstairs, the second-floor plan was thoughtfully reconfigured to create more intentional, comfortable spaces, complemented by beautifully renovated bathrooms with refined finishes and a clean, timeless style. Significant infrastructure investments further enhance the home for modern-day living. Throughout the residence, original architectural elements are balanced with natural materials, updated finishes and an understated sophistication that feels both relaxed and elevated. The exterior has also been carefully updated to meet today's
